Needling a mobility scooter to access the countryside is frustrating as it is very difficult to find out where access is possible. Too many paths have stiles and/or kissing gates, which are impossible to negotiate. It is also very hard to find out where these are situated.

Something like the Radar Key Scheme for disabled toilets would allow security gates to be fitted but permit disabled people to access the countryside.

Narrow footbridges and bridges with steps also make access very difficult.

Every Council should be encouraged to have so many miles of accessible paths and this information should be clearly published on one national website.
